

Chapter four describes the author's suggestions of how to use the unreclaimable land. The main suggestions are to afforestate land suitable for forestation and to use the rest as pasture land.

The last chapter deals with the other projects needed to facilitate carrying through land reclamation. These include the opening of agricultural roads, improving the existing roads and resurfacing them where possible. A wider use of mechanical tools and modern agricultural technology are also essential for such a project. The development of marketing and agro-industry should go alongside any development project concerned with agriculture. The need for agricultural research and experimental stations becomes evident in such a project.
