Such a high figure, in a region where landlessness among peasants is not acute, is explained by the fact that the refugee population living in encampments outside urban municipalities is subsumed under "rural" population. Of the total rural population that do have land, or access to land (i.e. 48.4% of total rural families in Table 7:1), about 5,400 families do not have any income other than family labour in their own farms.

Thus about 5% of rural households in the West Bank, and about 8% of the total families (urban, rural and refugees) -- if we are to trust the above figures -- derive their livelihood from family farms.²
