

the course on Planning in Socialist Countries with Professors Karen Polenske and Tunney Lee at the MIT Urban Studies and Planning Department. I especially benefited from the members of the study group I led in that class. To them, all my deep appreciation. I wish to express warm thanks to Professor Aaron Fleisher for his efforts and support.

The various forms of help that I got from Vu Thien Dinh, Guliz Pamukoglu, Alfonso Govela, Adriana Staedeker, and many other friends, was invaluable for the culmination of this thesis.

I am very thankful to all those who read my initial thesis prospectus and commented on it. It is at that stage that suggestions and criticisms were most crucial. Rosemary Taylor's were most guiding in transforming the directions of the study into what this thesis came to be.

My thanks also to Professor Michael Bruno for an illuminating discussion and helpful suggestions and information in the early stage of this study.

The immense support I have got from my colleagues in the World Agricultural Research Project at Harvard Public Health School, where I am presently a Research Fellow, is profoundly appreciated. I wish to extend my warmest thanks to them all, especially Dick Franke, Barbara Chasin, for reading and commenting on parts of the thesis, and to Steve Lewontin who, in addition to that, undertook the adventure of correcting my English.

In advance, I thank the readers and wish to express my gratitude to those who will be kind enough to send me comments and criticisms.
